TLDRThe U.S. Supreme Court has ruled 5-4 that the State of Alaska cannot use its asset forfeiture laws to seize a boat and its related goods that were transporting cargo of illegal marijuana. The decision marks an important victory for the petitioner, Captain Stephen Maureen Carroll, who was accused of transporting marijuana from Alaska to a California port, where he hoped to sell the weed, the Associated Press reports. Carroll, who had been on "trial by sea" since his arrest last May, had sued the state on the grounds that his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights were being violated by the forfeiture of his boat and $200,000 worth of cargo. The Supreme Court ruled unanimously on Tuesday that the forfeiture was an unconstitutional violation of Carroll's right to due process, as the petitioner had been subjected to an "extraordinary deprivation of property." The decision puts an end to what has been a protracted legal battle for the sailor, who had previously won some high-profile cases involving the War on Drugs, but had lost some earlier ones. As The Christian Post's Eriq Gardner notes, the conflict began when Alaska State Trooper Kenneth Seyler seized the boat, which was sailing off Point Adams, Alaska in a series of drug-smuggling transactions. Carroll suspected that the troopers, who were joined on board by drug-sniffing dogs, were attempting to catch him after he dropped off the illegal contraband in a port south of Vancouver, British Columbia. "There was a lot of resistance at first to search the vessel," lawyer Brian Smith, who represents Carroll's boat and its cargo, told the Associated Press. "He was interrogated by both the state police and the FBI. When the owner of the boat won the right to counsel, the investigating officers were required to contact the Coast Guard and ask for a warrant to search the boat and its bff6bb2d33
